THE THIRD GROUP WANTS TO OPPOSE THE GOVERNMENT, BUT NOT OPENLY, AND TO DEVOTE ITS EFFORTS TO BENEFIT THE WORKERS.)

3. IN HIS DISCUSSIONS WITH MALDONADO, THE ERP LEADER SAID THAT THE ERP'S MORALE IS GOOD; IT HAS ADEQUATE FUNDS, AND ENJOYS GROWING SUPPORT AMONG ARGENTINE WORKERS. IN ADDITION, THE ERP IS FUNDING THE REVOLUTIONARY COORDINATING COUNCIL (JCR), A BUENOS AIRES-BASED GROUP COMPOSED OF LEADERS FROM THE URUGUAYAN TUPAMAROS, THE BOLIVIAN NATIONAL LIBERATION ARMY (ELN), AND THE CHILEAN MOVEMENT OF THE REVOLUTIONARY LEFT (MIR). THE JCR, HE SAID, IS EFFECTIVELY SUPPORTING THE ERP'S ACTIVITIES.

4. IN RESPONSE TO QUESTIONING FROM MALDONADO, THE ERP LEADER INSISTED THAT HIS GROUP IS NOT SEEKING A SIMILAR ACCORD WITH OTHER EXTREMIST GROUPS IN ECUADOR. THE ERP LEADER IMPLIED, HOWEVER, THAT HE PLANNED TO TRAVEL TO COLOMBIA AND POSSIBLY VENEZUELA TO MAKE SIMILAR ARRANGEMENTS WITH EXTREMIST GROUPS IN THOSE COUNTRIES.

Argentine Intelligence man Slain

BUENOS AIRES -- A gunman screaming "We've come to liquidate you" shot and killed the Defense Ministry intelligence chief yesterday as he shopped in a suburban grocery store, police said.

They said the gunman fired several shots point blank at Rolando Silioni, ran out of the store and escaped in a car carrying three other persons.

Newspapers said they received communiques from the so-called Aug. 22 Commando, apparently a splinter group of the People's Revolutionary Army (ERP), claiming responsibility for the assassination. (The date Aug. 22 marks the killings of 16 left-wing guerrillas at a navy base in 1972.)

Argentine guerrillas boast of rural offensive

By Reuter

Buenos Aires

Argentina's People's Revolutionary Army, plans to step up its guerrilla warfare to fan the flames of armed socialist revolution across South America.

The army has founded its first rural brigade, after four years of offensive action in Argentine cities, and it has pledged to subsidize guerrilla organizations of fellow-Marxists in neighboring countries.

Thus the guerrillas, usually known by the Spanish initials ERP (Ejercito Revolucionario del Pueblo), hopes to do what Ernest O. "Che" Guevara failed to do — light the fuse of a revolt which would spread throughout the continent.

Guevara, the Argentine-born Cuban revolutionary, was killed by troops in 1967 while trying to establish a center for continent-wide guerrilla activity in the jungles of eastern Bolivia.

Four months ago the ERP announced that it had joined three other leftwing guerrilla organizations, from neighboring countries, in a Latin American revolutionary junta.

One is the rump of Guevara's Bolivian enterprise, the National Liberation Army (ELN).

The second is the revolutionary Movement of the Left (MIR), which operated legally as a vanguard group under the late socialist-President of Chile, Dr. Salvador Allende, but was driven underground after last September's bloody military coup d'etat.

The third is Uruguay's National Liberation Movement (MLN), or Tupamaros. Thousands of suspected MLN members were jailed after an "internal war" by the armed forces in 1972.

None of the other three movements have anything like the wealth or power of the ERP. But it has just said it will split $5 million between them, and this could be enough to breathe in new life.

The money will come from a ransom paid by the United States-owned ESSO (Exxon) Oil Company for the release of a refinery manager, Victor Samuelson, kidnapped last December and released two months ago.

The ransom, $14,200,000 was, according to military experts here, enough to keep about 1,500 guerrillas armed and active for a year.

When the revolutionary junta was founded, the four guerrilla movements issued a joint communique saying the struggle for socialism in Latin America would be long.

They called on "the exploited Latin American workers, the poor peasants, the poor of the cities, the students and intellectuals, the revolutionary Christians, and all those elements originating in the exploiting classes who are willing to work with the just, people's cause," to join them "under the banner and the example of commander Che Guevara."

The ERP until recently operated only in cities. But police and troops scoured a remote region of northwestern Argentina last month in a vain search for a suspected rural ERP brigade.

The ERP has since confirmed that such a brigade exists. It described the government operation against it as a total failure and said it intended to create more rural fronts.

This is not only a challenge to the Argentine government of President Peron, it is also worrying the rightwing regimes in Bolivia and Chile. All the wilder parts of Argentina are near their frontiers.

The ERP, hoping to enroll untapped support in the countryside, claimed that it would soon multiply its firepower and be able to take on the armed forces in open combat.

Argentina's Marxist guerrilla movement is already known to have increased its numbers from among former Peronist guerrillas, disappointed with General Peron's conservatism since last year, when he returned to power.

E025x1

National Intelligence Bulletin

June 18, 1974

ARGENTINA

The Marxist People's Revolutionary Army (ERP) recently announced plans to form rural guerrilla fronts, following four years of major successes in urban subversion. The terrorist leaders apparently intend to concentrate both on increasing internal activities and strengthening ties with similar groups in neighboring countries.

According to a communiqué signed by guerrilla leader Roberto Santucho, the move to develop an operating capability in the countryside will enable his organization to maintain closer contact with subversive groups in neighboring countries and "fan the flames of armed socialist revolution across South America." The communiqué stated that part of the funds obtained in the ransom of Exxon executive Victor Samuelson had been distributed to these groups.

The ERP announced earlier this year that it was establishing a coordinating junta with marxist organizations in Chile, Bolivia, and Uruguay, but there has been little evidence until recently of increased activity.

E025x1

The simultaneous development of urban and rural guerrilla fronts may also represent a propaganda effort to point up embarrassing failures of recent security operations. Last month, hundreds of police and soldiers raided a rural guerrilla base in northwest Argentina. The widely publicized operation came to an embarrassing end when the ERP temporarily seized the town from which the security forces had operated.

Despite the new emphasis on rural guerrilla fronts, it is unlikely that the ERP will shift its main focus away from the cities. Rural areas could, however, serve as a temporary haven should the government's counter-terrorist program eventually prove more successful. Rural insurgencies in other Latin countries have generally failed for lack of local support.
