URUGUAY

1. Human Rights Conditions in January, 1977

Integrity of the person was the most serious concern. Uruguay had up to 3,355 political prisoners. Torture was routinely used, regularly resulting in deaths. Disappearances were also often reported. Legal protection of the person was virtually in suspense with most "trials" in camera by military courts. Due process was unavailable and press coverage unknown. In fact, most political freedoms were in suspense. Political parties were not allowed to function, freedom of assembly was not recognized, news media were tightly controlled by censors and self-censorship. Red Cross visits to prisoners had been suspended and neither the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights nor other international agencies were authorized to visit the country. While a formal civilian government was in existence, de facto control was in the hands of a council of General Officers, with no evidence of when they might relinquish power.

2. Major Human Rights Events Since January, 1977

1. From up to 3,500, political prisoner population reduced to about 1,800, including 300 convicted of violent crimes, by January, 1979.
2. Institutionalized torture apparently was discontinued in 1978 although some reports continue. However mistreatment, especially during interrogation, continues.
3. About 200 short term detentions reported in 1978. Most, if not all, released within weeks.
4. Two Uruguayan U.N. mandated refugees kidnapped by Uruguayan security forces from Brazil in November, 1978.
5. Sweep arrests of about 20 Communists in February, 1979.
6. First ever prisoner list presented to UNHRC and USG in March, 1979.

7. International Red Cross officials visit Uruguay at government's invitation to discuss renewal of prisoner visits. March, 1979.
8. Public trials held for political prisoners. March, 1979.
9. Five key Military Commanders reinforce pledge of elections in 1981. March, 1979, during assumptions of commands.

There have been some significant improvements in integrity of the person, especially regarding torture, reduced detentions, and release of prisoner list. However, serious problems remain, especially continued detention of far too many political prisoners and absence of judicial and other institutional safeguards for individuals and associations. There is also still virtually no freedom of political activity. Whether and how restrictions will be relaxed before 1981 elections remains to be seen.

PERU

1. Human Rights Conditions in January, 1977

In January 1977, constitutional guarantees on habeas corpus, inviolability of the home, public assembly, freedom to travel and freedom from deportation were still suspended because of public disturbances that had occurred in mid-1976. Amnesty International reported some allegations of police torture during the investigative stage of criminal proceedings. These appeared to be acts by individual policemen. The government promised to investigate and to punish any guilty policemen. The antiquated legal system was characterized by lengthy delays in trial proceedings.

Peru had already entered a deep economic crisis, which continues. Limited tax revenues sharply reduced the government's ability to extend health, educational, and other social services to the poor, and forced it to lower or eliminate subsidies on food.

The Government occasionally detained and deported labor leaders and leftist politicians who attempted illegally to organize strikes at times when a state of emergency was in effect. National circulation daily newspapers were under direct government editorial control. Independent magazines existed, but were occasionally suspended.

2. Major Human Rights Events Since January, 1977

1. Price rises provoke disturbances with loss of life, June 1977.
2. Mrs. Carter's June 1977 visit serves as catalyst for Peruvians to reexamine their human rights performance.
3. Peru signs American Convention on Human Rights, July 1977, and subsequently ratifies.
4. Price rises for food and public transport spark widespread disturbances; some 15-20 persons shot by police, May 1978.

5. Free elections held for Constituent Assembly, June 1978. Assembly has met continuously to discuss national issues and draft new constitution. Elections scheduled for 1980.
6. State of emergency imposed to break mining strike, August-September 1978.
7. Communist-led unions fail in attempt to mount general strike, January 1979. Government briefly detained 1500 people including strike leaders and some politicians, to break the strike. Government reimposes state of emergency until March, 1979, and suspends 10 independent publications.

Despite the imposition of harsh measures against the press and certain labor activities, and the continuing economic crisis which has reduced real incomes by 40% in recent years and lowered living standards of the poor, Peru has made solid progress toward the reinstatement of elected constitutional government.

PARAGUAY

1. Human Rights Conditions in January, 1977

In January, 1977 integrity of the person was the overriding concern. Paraguay was holding about 600 political prisoners, torture was routinely employed on detainees, due process was rarely available. There were widespread (and generally believed) charges that Paraguay was pursuing a policy of genocide against unassimilated Indians, especially the Ache tribe. Political freedoms were severely restricted. State of Siege legislation authorized Executive suspension of basic freedoms at will. Freedom of assembly and the press were sharply curtailed. There was a Human Rights Commission but it was not very active. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission (IAHRC) was not formally in contact with the government. It was generally believed that the Paraguayan government was not committed to development with equity. The "Stroessner dictatorship", which showed no signs of ending, was generally considered one of the worst violators of basic human rights in the hemisphere.

2. Major Human Rights Events Since January, 1977

1. Of 600 political prisoners held in early 1977, all but 5 had been released as of December, 1978.
2. Torture has been discontinued except in isolated cases, the two most recent occurring in early 1978.
3. State of siege lifted outside Asuncion May 2, 1978.
4. Stroessner and Colorado dominated Congress re-elected for five years in controlled elections. February, 1978.
5. Stroessner in September, 1977 promised President Carter to schedule visit by IAHRC at "a future date". Visit not yet scheduled.
6. Press freedom became largely complete in 1978, save restrictions on attacking President and Military, and continuing control of electronic media.
7. Liberal leader Domingo Laino arrested, held 6 weeks and released in mid-1978.

8. Responding largely to international opinion, Paraguay Indian Institute placed under new Director with a mandate for improvements, mid-1978.
9. First Paraguayan Human Rights Congress held, December 1978.
10. President of Paraguay Human Rights Commission and peasant leader charged with violations of law. Attack considered politically motivated. Not expected to reach stage of formal trials. February-March, 1979.
11. Major ongoing agrarian resettlement results in return of about 200,000 emigres from abroad to Paraguay, many and perhaps most returning since 1976.

There have been notable reductions in abuses of integrity of the person and in restrictions on freedom of the press and assembly; there has also been progress on development with equity. However the principal institutions of repression remain in place and political liberties are still severely restricted.

ECUADOR

1. Human Rights Conditions in January, 1977

In January 1977 the human rights record in Ecuador was reasonably good. Although arbitrary arrests and short-term imprisonment occasionally took place (particularly of persons participating in anti-government plotting or illegal strike activity), there were no reports of torture, cruel or inhuman punishment. The great majority of Ecuadoreans had access to a fair trial and the Government generally respected freedom of expression, press, religion and assembly. The Government, however, did not hesitate to break up illegal strikes, to crack down hard on organized labor, and to jail anyone insulting its "dignity".

2. Major Human Rights Events Since January, 1977

1. Since 1977 the military government has implemented the plan to return the country to civilian rule.
2. On October 18, 1977 police attempted to disperse a crowd of striking workers. Panic ensued and twenty-five workers died.
3. On October 21, 1977 Ecuador ratified the American Convention on Human Rights.
4. On February 20, 1978 Assad Bucaram, leader of the populist Concentration of Popular Forces (CFP) and a severe critic of the military, was barred by the government from running in the presidential race. On July 16, 1978 the first round of presidential elections was held resulting in a surprise victory for CFP candidate Jaime Roldos.
5. During September 1978 the electoral board, together with some elements within the commercial oligarchy and the military, attempted to derail the electoral process by asserting that massive fraud had taken place on July 16. On September 23, 1978 the Supreme Council of Government announced that the process would continue.

A definite timetable was announced for completion of the process.

6. On November 29 maverick politician Abdon Calderon, leader of the small Fuerte Radical Alfarista, was shot in Guayaquil; he died ten days later in a Miami hospital.
7. Minister of Government General Bolivar Jarrin, implicated in the Calderon assassination, was dismissed on December 18.
8. In January 1979 a report from Amnesty International noted that some Shuar Indians may have been tortured by provincial police to force confessions in a murder case.
9. By mid-March 1979 the government had begun a crackdown of its critics. On March 17 a magazine that had criticized the government was shut down. On March 15 a retired military officer was sentenced to 2 years in jail and on March 19 a 70 year old journalist in frail health was detained in a military clinic both for criticizing the government.
10. On March 23 Minister of Government Garces promised the Embassy's Political Counselor that a full investigation regarding the Shuar case would be conducted.

Although recent incidents cast a shadow over Ecuador's relatively good human rights record, there is great optimism that the electoral process will be allowed to continue and that a democratic government, more responsive to human rights, will be inaugurated on August 10, 1979.

COLOMBIA

1. Human Rights Conditions in January, 1977

Colombia was a practicing constitutional democracy with an elected president, a two-house legislature, and an independent judicial system. Though beset with serious problems--including poverty, crime, narcotics trafficking, well-organized guerrilla terrorist activities, and occasional public disorders--Colombia's adherence to its democratic traditions and its respect for human rights was and has remained strong.

A state of siege, one of the many that have been imposed on-and-off over the past 25 years, was in effect in January 1977. This one had been imposed on October 7, 1976 because of increasing public disorder. Under a state of siege, the Government has broad powers to arrest and detain persons to preserve public order.

2. Major Human Rights Events Since January, 1977

1. Amnesty International Secretary General Martin Ennals congratulates President Lopez Michelsen in February 1977 for supporting resolution on torture at U.N. General Assembly.
2. National strike takes place in which some 30 persons are killed and close to 4,000 arrested and detained for disturbing public order in September, 1977.
3. Julio Cesar Turbay Ayala, Liberal Party candidate, wins hotly contested election in June 1978.
4. Government enacts Security Statute based on Article 121 of Constitution, and state of siege in effect since October 7, 1976, to combat rising wave of terrorism.
5. 103 suspected members of People's (EPL) Liberation Army, including 34 students, are arrested in October 1978. Students claim they were tortured.

6. Terrorist group, M-19, seizes almost 5,000 weapons from Government arsenal in northern Bogota, December 31, 1978/January 1, 1979.
7. Security forces make sweeping arrests which appear to roll-up M-19 terrorist group in Bogota, as well as other dissidents. Widespread charges of mistreatment of detainees focuses worldwide attention on human rights situation in Colombia. Government denies charges and orders investigations (January 1979).
8. Most arrested suspects are released after short detention. Charges are filed against some and trials begin in military courts in February resulting in some acquittals. All defendents have access to counsel.
9. On February 27, 1979 in a speech inaugurating an extraordinary session of Congress President Turbay stated that the individuals were detained by Military Institute Brigade under Article 28 of the Constitution. He declared that Congress should concern itself seriously with human rights questions and promised to present to next ordinary session of Congress legislation establishing position of "Defender of Human Rights."
10. On March 20, 1979 the Attorney General of Colombia, an official independent of both executive and legislative branches, submits his final report on the November, 1978 torture charges to President Turbay. Based in part on investigations carried out by a special military judge, the report absolves military personnel of torture charges.

The human rights situation, complicated by social unrest, increased terrorist/guerrilla activity and the Government's attempt to suppress such activity, has worsened somewhat since January 1977. The Government appears to be making a serious effort to conduct the campaign within constitutional and legal norms.
