This researcher submitted a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request for records relate to the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Securities Investor Protection Corporation. The Quayle Vice Presidential records proposed for opening are correspondence, printed material, papers, and statements. The correspondence contain letters and the memoranda primarily between Vice President Quayle, private citizens, administration officials, and congressmen regarding antifraud legislation and uniform statute of limitations for private actions brought under the SEC Act of 1934. The publications contain a newspaper article about class action securities fraud lawsuits and a copy of S. 1533, which would establish a statute of limitations for private rights of action. The papers cover topics such as a proposed banking bill amendment on fraud, a draft of legislation regarding attorney contingency fees, study of securities fraud class action lawsuits, and the administration's stance on deposit insurance reform and taxpayer protection legislation. Statements include testimony concerning statutes of limitation for implied private rights of action and SEC Chairman Richard Breeden's remarks on limiting the cost of securities litigation.
