and made oath that he was a witness on Board the armed Schooner Dolphin, the property of the State (commanded by Capt. William Middleton at the time the said Schooner was taken, and had been in the said vessel a considerable time previous, that he understood, at the time from Capt. Middleton and others, that under the direction of Gen. La Fayette, that while the Dolphin lay in the Patuxent River Gen. La Fayette came on board in a Barge, it then blowing a gale of wind, that the Gen. observed to Capt. Middleton that he could not venture down the Bay with him while the two British Ships lay at the mouth of the Patuxent River, that he would go down in the Barge and that the Schooner would follow on as soon as he Capt. Middleton thought he could do so with safety, and that he Middleton would make the best of his way to Little York. That the Dolphin got under way that night it blowing very hard about North, and proceeded down the Bay and arrived at Little York early next morning, then Commodore ^{Paul} Barron applied to Capt. Middleton for a Barge to go down to carry dispatches to the French Fleet and Capt. Middleton refused to do so and informed him that his Schooner was under the direction of Gen. La Fayette and could not go without the Gen's permission Capt. Middleton was then ordered by Gen.

^{the} ^{name of French officer with}
