	Federal offenders are entitled to file claims for work-related injuries sustained while confined in federal custody. Such claims are normally filed 30 days prior to an inmate's release from a correctional institution. Claims are adjudicated by a Claims Examiner at the Bureau of Prisons', Central Office, Washington, D.C. Following initial adjudication, inmates may appeal determinations at two levels. Such appeals may encompass a time period of up to one year. Upon exhausting the appeal procedures an inmate may appeal the determination to the courts only on the basis of an arbitrary and capricious decision. A claim file contains the inmate's claim, all documentation developed concerning the claimed injury while the inmate remained confined, medical information developed following the inmate's release from confinement, and other documentation concerning adjudication of the claim. All information developed subsequent to an inmate's release is contained only in the claim file. A record is initiated upon the filing of a claim and may be subject to future review due to a claimant's allegation concerning recurrent, progressive, or latent physical impairment arising from the claimed work injury.
