Background Information As part of the original comprehensive records schedule approved in 1987 after its independence from GSA (N1-64-87-1), NARA included a disposition for "Special Studies and Projects Records." This disposition made the final report of all such studies and projects permanent while making the working papers disposable. In later years, Records Management staff realized the inadequacy of such dispositions: by not defining "special studies and projects," the disposition was capturing many studies and projects that did not warrant permanent retention. Their subjects were too routine. Therefore, sometime in the early 2000s, the authority was rescinded and replaced with instructions that each study or project should have a separate SF 115 submitted. This would allow the Records Management staff to evaluate each one to determine whether they warranted permanent retention. This arrangement ultimately became unworkable as well, since the workload became extremely burdensome. Many project and study case files remained unscheduled. This schedule is meant to provide disposition authorities for all studies, providing selection criteria for significant studies while providing for the destruction of those not having archival value.
