Background Information

For two decades, Peace Corps Volunteers have been working with populations affected by HIV/AIDS, turning hope into action through the promotion of behavior change, and the development of sustainable, culturally appropriate solutions to the pandemic. The tireless efforts and dedication of our staff and Volunteers have made the Peace Corps a key partner in national responses to HIV/AIDS around the world; the unique role of the Peace Corps has enabled Volunteers to mobilize isolated communities and difficult to reach populations that would otherwise remain unreached. Worldwide in 2009, volunteers' HIV/AIDS activities provided assistance to over 1,000,000 individuals, over 42,000 HIV/AIDS service providers, and nearly 3,100 organizations.

Since the early days of the pandemic in the 1980s, Peace Corps Volunteers around the world have contributed to the global response to HIV by assisting communities to mitigate its effects. Over the years, Peace Corps has developed a niche in capacity building at the grassroots level. More than 20 years into the HIV pandemic, its effects on societies continues to be devastating and Peace Corps' efforts are needed more than ever to secure an AIDS free generation.

1	The President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) Interagency Agreement Records The President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) interagency implementation model is overseen at the headquarters level by the Office of the U.S. Global AIDS Coordinator at the Department of State, and by the U.S. Ambassador at the country level. The Peace Corps contributes significantly to the fight against HIV/AIDS, with programs in approximately 60 posts throughout the world. In the 2010 Annual Volunteer Survey, 2,444 Volunteers reported being involved in HIV/AIDS activities; less than 5% of these Volunteers had their service directly funded by PEPFAR. In Fiscal year 2011, the Peace Corps used funds from the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) to extend the impact of its work in HIV in 47 countries and one regional program overseas. Peace Corps posts in these countries use PEPFAR resources to enhance their HIV/AIDS programming and in-country training; field additional Peace Corps Response and two-year Peace Corps Volunteers specifically in support of Emergency Plan goals; and provide targeted support for community-initiated projects. As a grassroots capacity-building organization, the Peace Corps is uniquely positioned to play an essential role in any country strategy aimed at combating HIV/AIDS. The Peace Corps' contributes to the PEPFAR transition to sustainable, country-led responses to HIV by providing long-term capacity development support to non-governmental, community-based, and faith-based organizations, with particular emphasis on ensuring that community-initiated projects and programs provide holistic support to people living with and affected by HIV/AIDS. Peace Corps volunteers also aim to develop the necessary management and programmatic expertise at recipient and beneficiary organizations to ensure long-lasting support, particularly in rural communities. All of this is possible in large part because Peace Corps volunteers receive language and cultural training that enables them to become members of the communities in which they live and work.
1.1	The President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) Interagency Agreement Records Indicator Reports Disposition Authority Number DAA-0490-2016-0003-0001 Reports can include comparisons and analyses of Peace Corps project indicators, such as the number of hectares under improved technologies or management practices, or the number of individuals trained in business development, including income generation. These reports, which include tables, charts, and spreadsheets, gauge the effectiveness of activities and technologies used in projects. Reports also identify promising practices and technologies, and provide feedback to posts and Volunteers for use in revising project strategies to improve results. Final Disposition Temporary
