

Rojas seemed somewhat impressed with this argument so I suggested that he might use whatever influence he had to influence people like China, who he described as being definite in New York and depressed to the point of threatened suicide, to break away from the politicians and join the FID.

3. Rojas then began to speak of the basic differences between again what he calls the young revolutionaries, meaning the original 26th-of-July Movement people, and the politicians, such as Vorons, Sanchez Arango, et al, whom they refer to as "Los Viejos". The young revolutionaries feel that with "Los Viejos" in power that Cuba will slide backwards toward the old political regime and that these latter are only paying lip service to the proposition that the original aims of the revolution must go forward but without Castro and, of course, without any Communist influence. Rojas curiously referred to these politicians to the FID as being too far to the right. I said that this view of them was completely contrary to the view held by most who consider them to be liberals considerably far to the left. I added that if these people were any more to the left, they would be a source of serious worry to the U. S. Government. Rojas changed the subject.

4. He wanted then to know if it would be possible for the U. S. Government to lend its support to more than one group. When I responded that the U. S. Government was not supporting any group, Rojas just shrugged. He went on to say that if support could be given to individuals such as the military types he had mentioned previously and perhaps to the Alianza, for example, as a whole organization (shades of Don't Aggravate pitch!), that this would not only gain the services of very valuable people in the fight against Castro but might see the seeds of political stability for the future. He pointed out that if the young revolutionaries who are now rejected by the FID are stifled in their efforts to contribute to the anti-Castro struggle, they will represent a militant anti-American Cuban element for the future, which could be very damaging to U. S./Cuban relations. I think there is a fair amount of substance to this argument and I told him so. In any case, Rojas was given the routine non-U. S. involvement in these exile affairs (which, of course, he does not buy) and advice that he do whatever he can to bring about unity or between several groups. He was told that the FID appeared to be the group which had the greatest organization and greatest apparent potential for success, and that all concerned would be well advised to attempt to take part with it. Rojas said that he had a strong feeling that unity on this basis was not possible at this time because the feeling among the young revolutionaries was running too high and too emotionally against the FID. He said he thought these young revolutionaries feel that they have been let down by relinquishing politicians, and their friends and contacts in the U. S. Government have turned their backs and abandoned them. Because of this they are suffering bitterness and disillusionment. Rojas then suggested that perhaps I would be willing to arrange a meeting for him with some representatives of the FID, specifically this was not to be one of the five principals, who could meet with me in an attempt to reflect their differences and reestablish relationships and cooperation with the FID. I told him that this was an interesting suggestion but I thought it was not possible inasmuch as the U. S. Government, while it maintains a continuous interest in these affairs and has occasional contact with the several groups, is not and will not become involved. Rojas said he knows this to be untrue and is bewildered at the insistence that the U. S. Government is not sponsoring the PRD. I gave the counter-suggestion to him that he induce his friends, e.g. Gerde Agasro and Loris, to approach the PRD again and attempt on their own to make some accommodation. In doing so, I suggested they might consider obtaining the services of an older, more sophisticated, mature individual whom they could trust to represent them in these overtures to the PRD. I said I thought that the PRD's difficulties, for example, stem from poor representation. I believe that Rojas immediately mentally cast himself in this role. Our discussions ended at this point.

5. Rojas said that he was planning to stay in Miami only a few days, after which he would return to London. He said further that if as a result of his visit here he became convinced that he could contribute substantially to this Cuban exile situation in the U. S., he would return; otherwise, he plans to remain in Europe and attempt to find employment there. In Miami he stated he will stay with Loris, whose New phone number is Canal 6-0486.
