Background:

The IRS has sought a limited amount of information from various businesses to help identify individuals holding offshore credit cards. In some instances, the IRS has been unable to precisely identify individuals based on the information received from MasterCard (MasterCard does not directly issue cards to individuals but processes transactions for member banks licensed to issue the credit cards). To obtain or verify the actual names of some individuals, the IRS needed to take this additional step of going to some of the merchants where purchases were made. The IRS believed these firms, as part of the routine course of business, have information in their records identifying the people who made these transactions. The IRS will work cooperatively with the companies to obtain this limited information in an efficient, timely manner. By requesting these John Doe summonses, the IRS was not saying that these companies had done anything improper. As these companies conduct normal business with customers, they are unaware whether someone even has an offshore credit card. This effort is aimed at individuals dodging their tax responsibilities. The IRS wants to ensure offshore credit card users uphold their responsibility to all U S taxpayers and pay their fair share of taxes. Information gathered in this process will be used for possible civil examinations and criminal investigations.
