Let's talk!

Comments in the National Archives Catalog

Woman operating a computer, most likely not connected to the Internet.

It goes down in the comments. Commenting is a new feature we recently launched in the National Archives Catalog. Users can now comment directly on digital copies of records, descriptions of records, and authority records.

You can also take the discussion to another level on History Hub, our pilot support community. History Hub offers tools like discussion boards, blogs, and community pages to bring together experts and researchers.

How can I use comments? You can use comments to discuss a record with other users, add additional information to the record that is not part of the existing metadata, correct us where our archival description may be wrong, ask questions that other users or staff may be able to answer, and much more!

Example of a comment in the Catalog.

Please note that commenting is not a substitute for reference inquiries. If you have questions for which you would like a response from National Archives reference staff (such as obtaining copies, locating other relevant records, etc.) please use the inquire form on our website.

Commenting policy. When commenting in the Catalog, please be aware of our Citizen Contribution Policy. Our goal is to provide a productive, respectful environment to share ideas and information.
